- The band celebrates their tenth anniversary with this album release.

What better way to celebrate a tenth anniversary with your band than to take a trip through all those years you've been through together? But of course, you can't do it with just any boring compilation. No, nothing like that. The ideal thing is to release an album, a new one. With twelve new shots. New energy. And what's more, an album that clearly shows what the band is today. With all the maturity achieved on the way, yes, but also recovering the energy and high voltage of their beginnings. Well that is what Bullitt has done with Sparks. They've stood in front of a mirror to see who they really are and where they really come from. Whiplashes and wantonness takes over each minute, but your also find more relaxed moments that allow you to breath for a few seconds and realize where we are.

Their music, recorded as usual at the Studio Ultramarinos Costa Brava in Sant Feliu de Guixols with Santi and Víctor García, has that easiness, so difficult to achieve, that cheers up the listeners day. "Standing in a Circle", the albums first single, shows all the band's faces. Nineties Rock & Roll, but set on any transparent genre that believes in round compositions. There is pop, punk, rhythm and anger, and what's more important, there's honesty. That same honesty is what you'll find in "Game Over" or "Sparks" (songs that todays Dave Grohl would die for), in "Sister" (pure melodic hardcore from their early years) or "On The Edge" (moment that fits in tenderness and thought).

Some say there's a certain resemblance between he who signs these words and Xavi Calvet (guitar and vocals). That I could be his double, say some of the most daring...and, however, we have nothing to do with each other. Or maybe we do. Because even though Xavi grew up in Costa Brava, in his own personal Washington, and server grew up in the central plain of the Manchego outskirts, there is a universal link that joins people no matter how many kilometres are between them. This connection has to do with our taste for light, for a good melody, with knowing how to smile with songs that don't forget to include a subtle melancholic flavour and most of all, with songs that try to make your day to day a lot better. All of this extends and completes itself with Carlus (guitar and backing vocals), Ferran (bass and backing vocals) and Enric (drums), the rest of the band members and essential ingredients in this cocktail full of friendship that has just completed a fourth LP together. Just as "Friendship Never Ends" says, the friendship between these four will never end, and those that wish to find the reason of why Bullitt still shine today, the same or even more as the first day, will have to embrace this premise. Happy X anniversary and long live Bullitt.
